1. It is the grass between the sparse relatives of a dearly departed everybody knew.
2. It is the magnolia (not regarded as a compelling reason to leave the house) that is jubilant just around the corner.
3. It is the courier who parks his bike and takes the cube of food he doesn't even like from his sweaty back.
4. It is the bruise on the face of the nurse who wears an overly tight mask the whole day long and has two children.
5. It is the mannequin in a famous shopping street, showing a glittering evening gown to three sparrows and a stray cat.
6. It is the moss between café terrace tiles that have waited all winter for the first proper spring day.
7. It is the teacher who keeps on digitally reading the book she started in the classroom, because who doesn't want to know how something that has been started ends.
8. It is being alone amongst patient furniture and books of forgotten sentences and talking out loud to yourself, even when you don't expect an answer.
9. It is the memory of the newspapers a grandfather tore into toilet paper,
